Social, Familial, Neighborhood Factors and Drinking in Puerto Rico

The proposed specific aims are: 1) To examine the influence of attitudes and expectancies about drinking and of family cohesion and support on the association between drinking and alcohol-related problems, and DSM-IV abuse and dependence; 2) To examine the impact of the present economic recession on drinking behavior and associated consequences by examining the association between unemployment and underemployment, stress, depression, drinking, alcohol-related problems, abuse and dependence; 3) Expanding aims 1 and 2 to examine the association between neighborhood collective efficacy (social cohesion and social control), neighborhood disadvantage (as represented by the census-level variables overtly, undereducation and unemployment), volume of drinking, binge drinking, and alcohol abuse and dependence; 4) Given the specific cultural circumstances of Puerto Rico, some of which are described in aims 1, 2 and 3, above, test the cross-cultural applicability of the dimensionality of the newly proposed DSM-V substance use disorder criteria and examine the proportion and characteristics of diagnostic “orphans”.

Ethnic Differences in Drinking and Diabetes self-care activities

The proposed study may identify a significant, but modifiable barrier to diabetes self-management and control. Our findings may impact clinical practice by alerting health professionals about the importance of assessing patients’ drinking practices and addressing how these practices impact diabetes self-management activities and glucose control.

Acute Alcohol Use and Suicide

The goal of this project is to assess the influences of individual characteristics (e.g., age), immediate circumstances (e.g., firearm access), environmental factors (e.g., alcohol availability), and population characteristics (e.g., alcohol consumption levels) on connections between acute alcohol use and suicide. The National Violent Death Reporting System (NVDRS), population alcohol consumption survey data, and governmental alcohol control policies are analyzed to examine the relationship between acute alcohol use and suicide.
